GIVEN NEW YORK

One Man Would Call It

"City of Strangers."

MANY REASONS SUGGESTED

Fundamental Home Element Is Largely Lacking in This Great Community.

"I have read at various times that New York, the greatest city of this country, has no distinctive nickname," said Playwright William C. de Mills at the Players' Club in that city recently. "Boa'on is called "The Hub;" Brooklyn, the City of Churches; New Haven, the City of Elms; Chicago, the Windry, City, and so on through the whole list, each city being nicknamed because of some more or less pleasant attribute, lit has been claimed that New York is too cosmopolitan to have any one distinctive trait sufficiently sailent to form a sobriquet for the whole city. I do not agree with this claim.

"If I might, in all modesty, make a more suggestion as to a distinctive title for little old New York, is should name it the "City of Strangers." Not only because there are daily more out-of-town people and more foreigners passing the "City of Strangers."
